

Stay Away From Them or They Will Eat You Alive --

With Chili Sauce

by Adriana Jones, ©2011

www.itcvoices.org

I just had an interesting conversation with someone from an Orthodox Christian YouTube channel. We were intensely debating whether the ghost box is valid or invalid, whether it is dangerous or harmful, and here are two questions that were posed to me, and the answers that I gave.

Question: Does the ghost box present a danger with drawing attention from evil spirits?

Yes. The ghost box does present a danger with drawing attention from negative entities. I'm not going to call them evil spirits - because they mainly just seem to be negative earthbound human spirits who were unhappy and mean in this life and continue this pattern in the next life - which does not make them evil, just maybe means they need a hug, or they need to be smacked, or maybe both. Spirits, including negative ones, are everywhere all around us, as the ghost box is showing us. And, of course, they are around us not just when they're in spirit form, but also when they're in physical form. In other words, we are just as much in danger from living human beings affecting us negatively spiritually and physically, as we might be in danger from them in the afterlife. In fact, I can easily say that every negative imprint that has been left on my psyche or my body so far in my life, and has impeded my spiritual journey of becoming a better person closer to God, has been from negative living spirits, not dead ones. Negative people. I see the ghost box as no more dangerous than stepping out onto a highway in a fast car, or letting a new person into your life, who you don't know well, and you don't know if in the end they will help you or hurt you, lift you up, or knock you down. Intention is key. If you have good intentions, use the box with a loving heart, they will be more positively receptive to you. And just like in real life, I'm sure it's possible to come with the best intentions, and still have someone hurt you unfairly. And I guarantee you that the only direction from which I have received this kind of hurt so far in my life has been from living spirits, not dead ones.

Question: Could they not manipulate your perspectives concerning the technology you have accepted as a means for communicating with "spirits"?

Yes, easily! In fact, from literally day one I have been advised by other ghost boxers not to trust anything I receive across the box as "gospel truth". It would be naive to do so, because many people are liars in this life and if they're in the afterlife now, what's to prevent them from continuing to lie. Again, it's a matter of how you approach the box. You need to approach it with common sense. If you're naive to what living people tell you, if you'll believe everything your parents, and TV, and your government and your church tells you, I'm sure you could easily be misled by the box as well. From day one, the only thing I'm looking for, my main aim with the box, is "Am I receiving intelligent communication?" Communication that shows that something is intelligently interacting with me, immediately answering a question with a relevant answer, displaying to me that they are there - in the moment, conscious and interacting with me in real time.

Once you get to use the box, you will hear all kinds of entities: happy, sad, grumpy, angry. Many curse because they're probably not happy with where they are, others are quite chipper and content, and by far, the message that I receive most of all in almost all of my sessions is the call for help.

Those were some of the questions and answers. In addition, I want to say that I also do use the ghost box for the purpose of contacting previously-living now-deceased individuals, and I look for receiving messages from them, ideally in that person's own voice, the way it sounded when they were alive. Although this kind of ghost box activity does go beyond simply looking for intelligent answers to my questions, and assumes much more than simply intelligent consciousness... it is undeniable to me personally that by all surface appearances, now-deceased previously-living people do communicate with us through the ghost box. Is it, in theory, possible these voices are not really their voices, but simply deceitful entities playing pranks on us? Is it possible that the personal details they voice back to us come from them reading our own minds, and throwing them back at us in the deceased relative's voice, the way we remember their voice in our memories of them?Sure, why not. Anything is possible. But realistically, logically and practically speaking, how probable is it? If we've gone as far as to show that intelligent consciousness does manifest outside of the living biological human brain... how much of a stretch is it to safely assume that we are indeed contacting previously living now deceased individuals through the ghost box? Logically speaking, not that much of a stretch at all as far as I can see. Add to that the fact that all major religions, all across different cultures and time periods, all unanimously and independently agree about the existence of some form of afterlife... add to that all the "ghost stories" passed on from generation to generation, independently and confidently across all cultures and time periods.... (And isn't this kind of independent and insistently repeated confirmation what empirical science comes down to in the first place? Can that many people be wrong? Have all human beings spanning all cultures and eras simply been schizophrenically hallucinating in the exact same specific abstract way? What a strange mental illness epidemic that would be) and I personally feel pretty at peace with concluding that we are contacting human spirits who are consciously existing in their afterlife reality. Could I still be completely wrong in the end? Only time will tell, and I still do keep this possibility in the back of my mind all the time. The more I learn, the more I realize how little I do know.